

Are you currently a pre-medical student? Do you want to learn about community-based health programming in a developing country? Can you "rough it" for one year in rural India?

Then maybe you'd like to apply for the year-long Mabelle Arole Fellowship 2007-2008. The Mabelle Arole International Fellows:

- Learn about community-driven programming, how it works, and how it contributes to a community's well-being.
- Live and work at the Comprehensive Rural Health Project, Jamkhed, India, for almost one year.
- Work with one of the best primary health projects in the world.
- Learn about the priority health care areas addressed: community-based primary care, women's health, under-fives care, family planning, control of chronic illnesses, prevention of infectious diseases, and integrated rural development.
- Work on a project, depending on current CRHP activities and your interest.

Please note: Only one U.S. citizen or permanent resident who has been accepted to medical school but has not begun yet will be accepted to this year-long program based in Jamkhed, India. For more information, reports from prior Fellows and an application, please visit AMSA's website <http://www.amsa.org/resource/mabelle.cfm>. The Fellowship is being made possible through a partnership between AMSA and John Snow Research and Training. All applications and accompanying paperwork must be received no later than close of business, Tuesday, January 16, 2007 (proof of medical school acceptance will be accepted at a later date.)
